□ Examines the role of war correspondents in Hollywood films made from the Vietnam War era to 2002. Such films as The Green Berets (1968), Salvador (1986), and We Were Soldiers (2002) portray war reporting as an ambivalent occupation in which noncombatant correspondents are often called on to make a commitment and even take up arms. Correspondents obsessed with "getting the story" are often ridiculed or played as buffoons.

□ In a study in how cultural texts represent women to themselves & society, the film Broadcast News (1987) is examined from a feminist perspective. C. Gledhill's (1989) concept of negotiation, which analyzes the struggle between competing frames of reference (text vs consumer) to derive meaning from cultural commodities, is employed to study the film's ideological message that white professional women must make a choice between a career or a personal life, & choosing a career makes them less a woman in the traditional sense. However, the film also offers moments that contradict this dominant ideology.

□ Scholars have called for cultural analyses of the press that are more attuned to journalists' self-image as disciples of facts and truth while also critically examining the contradictions within that self-image. Popular representations of journalism such as motion pictures are one fruitful site of inquiry. This article studies American movies' depictions of 'bad journalists', characters who in many ways contradict the image of upstanding professionalism that the press tries to promote. Although real-life journalists over the years have often objected to such portrayals, 'bad journalist' characters still have helped shore up the press's preferred self-image, either by seeing through lies and pretense to the truth or by paying the price for not telling the truth.

Hanson, Christopher (1996) Where have all the heroes gone? [Journalists are no longer portrayed as heroes.] In: Columbia Journalism Review 34, 6, S. 45-49.

□ Hollywood is no longer depicting reporters as heroes, which is a reflection of the current mood toward journalists. In 1976, All the President's Men glamorized the press, but Oliver Stone's 1996 Nixon hardly mentions Woodward and Bernstein. In 1994, the movie Quiz Show did not mention the key role newspaper reporters played in uncovering the game show scandals of 1958. The journalist as a rogue is much more popular in the movies of the '90s.

 □ Sympathetic portrayals of journalists in motion pictures, such as All the President's Men, and on television series, such as Lou Grant, often inspire budding reporters to seek careers in journalism. Although Hollywood's depictions of the profession may not be realistic, they do not necessarily lead to disillusionment later on. Three journalists describe the way such portrayals influenced their career choices and how they have successfully adapted their glamorous expectations to the real world of journalism.
